This boundary marker delimiting Alsace and Lorraine would have been built during the Napoleonic period. However, the base would date from the Gallo-Roman period. It was nevertheless partly destroyed during the Second World War.

Museum of Glass and Crystal from Meisenthal (C)

Glass and Crystal Centre shows the development of this craft industry which gave acclaim to the Bitche region. It is highly symbolic: it houses the old glassworks where Emile Gallé, leader in the Nancy School was initiated in the art of glass, making Meisenthal the “cradle of Art Nouveau glass». Visitors will be astounded by these stunning items mostly created in the region.

Meisenthal Glass Heritage Site (D)

The House of Glass and Crystal represents the evolution of this art giving its noble name to Pays de Bitche. A symbol: This house was the original glass hall where Emile Gallé, head of the School of Arts at Nancy, started working with glass, making Meisenthal the cradle of Art Nouveau glass. Today, the museum is in memory of the local glass industry. After an audio-visual show, the guided visit shows you the techniques used in the 'technical room', followed by a visit to a sumptuous collection of Art Nouveau glass, notably masterpieces signed by Emile Gallé but also other masterpieces created by other famous glassmakers such as Desiré Christian and Eugene Kremer. An amazing moment awaits you in front of these splendid exhibits, most of which were created in the region.
